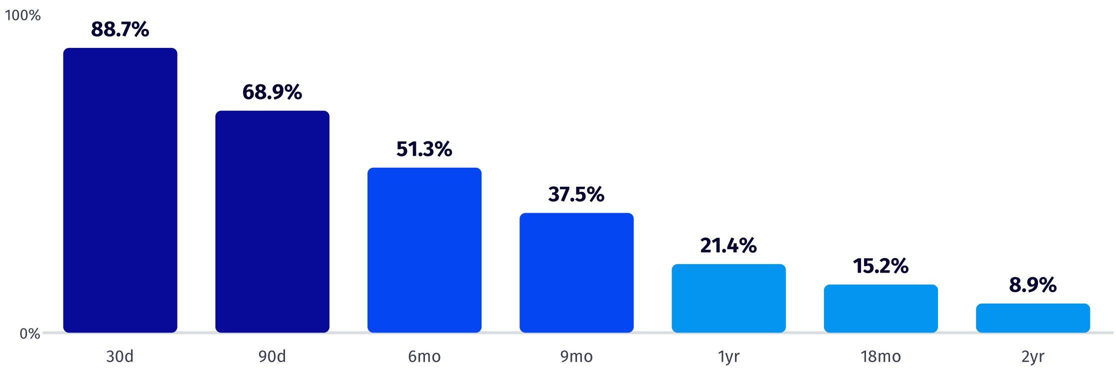
THE SHORT VERSION

When you last used us, it worked — you placed 2 accounts totaling $10,596 and we recovered $2,638 for you, roughly a 24.9% return on what you handed over. Then the placements stopped, nearly two years ago. The question this brief answers: what would that same performance look like applied to your full past-due AR, placed on time — instead of two accounts placed late and nothing since?

Why timing decides how much you recover

Commercial receivables lose collectability fast — and predictably. This is the industry benchmark curve (Commercial Collection Agencies of America, via the Credit Research Foundation): the probability a delinquent commercial account is collected, by its age past due when it's placed.

Collectability of delinquent commercial debt, by age at placement



The single biggest lever you control is how fast you place. Placing at 90 days vs. letting an account age past a year is a ~47-point swing in recovery odds.

THE 90-DAY RULE

Accounts placed around 90 days past due carry a ~69% recovery probability. Wait to 120 days and it slips to ~63%; let them drift to 6 months and you're near a coin flip. Most businesses place too late — the accounts that "aged out" were usually recoverable if they'd moved sooner.

What this could mean for you

Plug in your typical monthly past-due AR and this models expected recovery at each placement age, your net after our contingency fee, and the annualized picture of placing on a regular cadence. The starting figure is illustrative — replace it with your real monthly past-due number.
